About Kristin Irén Dijkman

Our generation, the generation born after the Second World War, was the first to reflect on the values of the consumerism. It has been the generation that led individuals to reflect on what is important in human life, what has permanent value, what is object not of consumption but for careful and studied use, what has moral and existential values but also what has real economic values that endure over time.

Even the art has been involved by this movement and the artists you see today, such as Kristin Irén Dijkman, are returning to the discovery of art as an expression of quality and technique, as a value that remains from generation to generation, and not just as a complement to furniture and design, subject to the fashions of the time. Kristin is very able to express the personality of the people in her portraits, an unusual gift also for famous portraitist, often attentive to physiognomic details but not to the individual personality, as result of a human and existential process. The portraits of Kristin comprise the high quality, because they describe to the future generations, certainly not the physical character of the person, but the story behind the person, his emotions, his joys and melancholy.

That's why the artworks of Kristin are artworks for posterity, artworks in which to invest, artworks intended for the future people, as it should always be for quality art.
